US Consumer Sentiment Sinks to the Lowest Level in a Decade

The University of Michigan's Surveys of Consumers preliminary report for the United States (US) in February 2022, shows that the Index of Consumer Sentiment declined to 61.7 from the final reading of 67.2 in January 2022, and was the lowest reading in a decade. This preliminary reading fell well short of market expectations for the overall sentiment index to decline only slightly to 67.0. Consumer sentiments in the US continue to trend below the 100-mark threshold, indicating that consumers are still pessimistic about the economy's prospects. Noteworthy, a reading above the 100-mark threshold would indicate that consumer sentiment towards the future economic situation has improved. February's lower reading was likely due to consumers' weakening personal financial prospects due to rising inflation, less confidence in the government's economic policies, and the least favorable long-term economic outlook in a decade. Notably, all of February's decline was among households with incomes of $100,000 or more. When looking forward to the year ahead, almost half of all consumers surveyed expected declines in their inflation-adjusted incomes. Consumers also shared that they expect an inflation rate of 5% over the next year, up from last month's reading of 4.9%. The Current Economic Conditions Index declined by 4.9% month-over-month to 68.5 and the Consumer Expectations Index declined by 10.5% to 57.4.

Although households have benefitted from a resilient labour market, it is likely that consumer sentiment may remain pessimistic especially about their personal financial prospects over the short term. This is based on an environment that continues to be impacted by uncertainty over COVID-19, ongoing supply chain constraints, high inflation and expectations for even higher prices. In light of this, it is anticipated that the US Federal Reserve could move to implement its first interest rate increase next month in order to help curtail inflation.
